In a balanced report on the nation's police problem, William Turner takes the reader on a tour of police departments in major U. S. cities, showing how they operate and who's in charge. In most he finds a lot of prejudice among policemen, and he makes a strong case for a civilian complaint review board. But he also shows that the cop is a victim himself, underpaid, undereducated, unprepared to deal with social problems he doesn't understand, and unappreciated for the good he actually does.
